

An Update about Just JavaScript

Hey!

You might remember signing up for updates about Just JavaScript sometime in the past. If not, that's OK! This email will get you acquainted. You can also click here to unsubscribe if you don't want any more emails about Just JavaScript. (note, there is no "undo" if you click that link)

Over the past few years I've been working with Maggie Appleton on a project called Just JavaScript.

In the first iteration, the one you may have seen, we sent out a set of emails and quizzes that described JavaScript from a new perspective; through the lens of mental models.

Tens of thousands of folks read those "beta" emails, did the exercises, and provided amazing feedback about what they learned. They told us the mental models of Just JavaScript leveled up their understanding of both JavaScript and programming in general.

With that feedback Maggie and I worked together to refine Just JavaScript. We've now created a useful and friendly learning experience for you to work through.

Just JavaScript is ready to share!

Maggie and I are finally releasing Just JavaScript.

Just JavaScript is a crafted experience.

We will teach you a set of core mental models for JavaScript.

These models will help you deeply understand JavaScript as a language. Just JavaScript serves as both a guide and a reference as you continue to learn and grow as a developer.

Just JavaScript isn't intended to be an introduction to JavaScript. While Just JavaScript is useful for beginners, this approach is meant to be an entry point into your career as a web developer. It provides insight into a language you may have been using for years already.

For folks that have already received the emails and worked through the exercises, this material won't be new. Just JavaScript has been refined and presented in a more cohesive format that is easier to reference and (re)work through.

If you don't want to hear about Just JavaScript anymore you can click here to "mute" emails about it.

This is a special release price that ends at the stroke of midnight (Pacific) August 1st, 2021.
